Grizzlies and Saves His Boy. The Matilija Canyon the Scene of the Fight - Ramon Ortega the Hero of it.

Robert Lyon, of Cliff Glen, Ventura chiefs and a lot of China silk coats.

Robert Lyon, of Ciiff Glen, Ventura county, communicates the following to the Ventura Signal:

The timber-clad hills at the head of the Mathija seem to be teeming with droves of grizzly bears. Last week nine were seen in one day near the ranch of Rafael Ruiz, some of them monsters in size; and on last Thursday, August 24th, Schor Ramon Ortega shot three grizzlies. Ortega and his mine were even in one day hear the ranch of Rafael Ruiz, some of them mousters in size; and on last Thursday, August 24th, S. for Ramon Ortega shot three grizzlies. Ortega and his twelve-year-old boy were riding in the hills above the Mattlija looking for cattle, when one large grizzly, and two that were conside ably smaller, came out of the brush and hilted not more than fifty yads from them. Ortega jumped from his horse to get a good shot, when his horse got frightened at the sight of so many bears, and started and ran away about 100 yards, when he stepped on his bridle and stopped. Ortega took a good aim at the big bear, and dropped it dead at the first shot. He then drew on one of the smaller bears, and it, too, tumbled in its tracts, never raising again. The other bear then took to the brush followed by a savage dog. After assuring him-elf that the two bears were dead, Mr. Ortega sent his boy on foot to bring back his horse. The boy started, but before he got to the horse, his dog, closely pursued by a savage and angry bear, overtook him. As soon as the bear saw the boy he rushed at him, paying no more attention to the dog, and the boy was too frightened to do anythic g but stand still and call to his father to save him. Ortega seized his rifle and fired just as the bear had raised on his haunches to strike the boy; the bullet knocked the bear down, but he rid and drain and have a the boy the bullet knocked the bear down, but he rid and drain and the boy was too frightened to do anythic g but stand still and call to his father to save him. the trusheared the frightened boy sank to the ground, and the desperate father sent a second bullet from his faithful repeating rifl crashing into the bear's body, and with an almost human cry of agony the savage brute fell backwards and reled down the hill. Ortega rushed to the boy and found him uninjured. And then the great hunter, who has killed then the great hunter, who has killed more grizzly bears that any man in Southern California, thanked God for the miraculous preservation of his boy's life, and for some time he was too weak from the shock at his boy's great peril to even lift his rifle. He did not hunt for the wounded bear, for the hunt for the wounded bear, for the brush was very dense at the bottom of the ravine, and he thought he had adventure sufficient for one day.

The largest of the two dead bears would weigh over 1500 pounds; it was all two strong horses could do to dr. g it to a tree near by. The oth r, which was quite poor, would veigh about 700 pounds. Ottega took off their pells, and the largest one measured eight feet in length and seven and a-half feet in breadth. He has the skins at his cabin, and they are both beautiful furs. they are both beautiful furs. Schor Ortega certainly deserves great credit for his nerve and courage in that terribly trying time.

[From Ramon, who was in town this week, we learn that he afterwards got the wounded bear. One of his friends tells us, in speaking of his bear adventures, that in one winter, on the Seperancho, Ortega captured fifty-lour bears with the lasso.—ED. Signal.]

FOR BRAIN-WORKERS.

In response to a circular recently sent out by Arthur Reade, who has been collecting information as to the habits of literary men in regards to stimulants, the Abbe Moigno gives an interesting record of his experiences. The letter appearing in his paper, Les Mondes, states that he has published 150 volumes, small and great; that he scarcely ever leaves his work table, and never takes walking exercise; yet he never has a trace of headache or brain weariness.
